Integration of behavioral health and primary care services can both enhance compliance with preventive care, thereby improving the effectiveness of chronic disease treatment, and help engage patients in self-management to improve lifestyle behaviors that contribute to these chronic conditions. Integration of the two disciplines also can decrease expensive and frequently unnecessary emergency department visits and inpatient admissions, particularly for patients with more severe mental health conditions, who tend to have a high degree of physical health comorbidities. In short, the clear economic and patient care benefits that can be gained from integrating physical and behavioral health services logically suggest that such a strategy should be a clinical and business priority for any organization making the transition from fee for service to population health management.
